Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: . . . Our Conception of Species as Modified by the Doctrine of Evolution. By N. L. Britton. One of the most familiar axioms laid down in modern writings is to the effect that the word species is most difficult to define. This difficult-is, indeed, cumulative, as the number of different living organisms known increases, each new species brought to light showing some peculiarity of structure or form in which it differs from all others, but also indicating by some other characters its genetic relationship to its kin. Thus, as our knowledge of living things increases, our notions of their relationships undergo modification, in groups of lower rank as well as in those of higher. It is clear that the naturalists of the early part of the century had far less difficulty with the species question than we of to-day, and the disrepute which it has been sought by some narrow-minded writers to shroud the whole sciences of Systematic Botany and Zoology has been largely initiated by the inherent difficulty of the subject. Indeed, at the present day it is only the very broadest kind of training coupled with acute faculties for observation and intimate acquaintance with an enormous number of different organisms that equip a student as a really successful systematist. What wonder is it then that so few attempt these lines of research? The difficulty surrounding the delimitation of species has for its origin, according to modern scientific thought, the past condition of organisms as...
